New strategy to fight dementia

The Japanese government has made a 10-year plan to fight dementia, a disease of older people which makes their memory worse.

"Dementia is a disease that could affect anyone. The population of Japan is aging rapidly, so we must deal with this issue seriously" said Japanese Prime Minister, Shinzo Abe.

Government data shows that by 2025, one in five Japanese senior citizens will suffer from dementia. The new plan invites governments of every town and city to help fight against this disease.

The new plan provides appropriate medical and nursing care, as well as trials of new drugs. It also suggests building new types of homes designed specifically for the elderly population.
